Transcending history

The canvases of Mark Rohrig come to life with bold colors that capture the spirit of the Native American peoples. His dramatic portraits don't capture a precise moment in time, but rather history serves as a guide and as inspiration for his works.

"I would describe my work as 'mystical realism,'" explains Rohrig. "I try to capture human emotions as best I can through the Native Americans I depict. From an early age I was fascinated with Native American culture, and I identified with their pain as well as their nobility; mostly their endurance. I try to capture that in every painting I produce. I've been a professional artist since 1974, and each year has been its own revelation and surprise and I look forward to continuing."

Mark D. Tarrant, owner of Altamira Fine Art in Jackson, comments on Rohrig's work, "Viewers stop and look and are mesmerized by his images. His work captures an intensity of attitude and emotion. Very few artists match his level of detail and ferocity."

Sonny Ruggiero, co-owner of Adagio Galleries in Palm Desert, adds, "It is amazing to watch how, when someone passes a piece of Mark Rohrig art, they stop, look and comment on how spiritual the eyes and faces of the Native Americans are as well as the detail involved in portraying his figures. It is because of this that we feel Rohrig's art is so appreciated and sought after."

Although Rohrig took a few art classes, he considers himself self-taught and has been working professionally for almost 40 years. He has been working exclusively in acrylics since his late teens.

Rohrig's work hangs in public and private collections around the country. He is represented by Altamira Fine Art, Jackson, WY; Wind River Gallery, Aspen, CO; Indian River Gallery, Las Vegas, NV; and Adagio Galleries, Palm Desert, CA. 🐾
